

You're excited for some one-on-one time with your best friend who lives a few hours away. You've got plans for all the things you're going to do together. Before your best friend arrives for the weekend, the kid next door shows up and wants to hang out with you, too. How can you share your time?

There's a man who lives across the street who spends time every day sitting on his front porch. He doesn't seem to have much going on. He's too old to work. He doesn't have any family. And you're pretty sure no one ever comes to visit him. What can you share?

You worked hard all summer long pet sitting in your neighborhood. Your parents told you that if you wanted to play on the travel baseball team, you had to pay for half of the fees. You've also been learning in church about being generous. Is there a way to share what you've earned and still get to play baseball?

You've been excited about an update to your favorite video game. Your friends have been talking about playing for hours after the update. Right before you open the game, you see your dad doing yard work in the hot sun. There's still a lot more to do. How can you share your time?

You're eating lunch with your friends in the school cafeteria when you notice a friend who isn't eating anything. When you ask why, she says she forgot her lunch at home. Your mom happened to pack your favorite lunch today: ramen noodles in a thermos. How can you share what you have?

While on a walk around your neighborhood, you notice a little boy sitting on a swing by himself looking sad. He's trying to get the swing going, but he's having a hard time. You see that his grownup is busy taking care of a baby. How can you help?

Your parent is out of town on a business trip, and your uncle is staying with you and your siblings to help. Mornings are always a little hectic in your house, especially when your parent isn't there. What do you have that could help?

Your little sister has been having a hard time with reading. Is there a way you can share what you have to help?

The closets in your house are full of clothes that don't fit or that your family just does not use anymore. You brought a flyer home from school this week about a winter clothing drive. How can you share?

You have a new kid in your class, named Tayo. You learn that his family just moved here from overseas. He doesn't speak any English and hasn't made any friends yet. It's hard to imagine what that must feel like! How can you help?
